

NORBERTO ROLDAN

HOW NOT TO WIN A REVOLUTION

Norberto Roldan presents this new trilogy of multimedia textile series in How Not to Win a Revolution as critical case studies of seemingly successful insurrections in the artist's native country, dialectically probing the historic and contemporary struggles for emancipation against various oppressive forces. Pasión y Revolución (all 2024) considers the 1896 struggle for independence against Spanish colonialism; Born Again Revolution concerns the Marcos years; and West Philippine Revolution scrutinises the ongoing territorial dispute between China and the Philippines over the eponymous waters. Within these respective series, the artist specifically and simultaneously identifies three effects of local rebellions that have actually sustained systems of economic, social and political inequality: elitism, religion and language.

Pasión v Revolución borrows its title from Reynaldo C. Ileto's landmark text Pasyon and Revolution: Popular Movements in the Philippines 1840-1910 (1979) in which the author relates the 'successful' 1896 revolution that liberated the Philippines from Spain to the ubiquitous 'Pasyon' document that discusses a "subversive" figure, Jesus Christ, who attracts mainly lowly, common people (taong bayan), draws them away from... their relations of subservience... and forms a brotherhood (catipunan) that will proclaim a new era of mankind'. Religion, the Spanish's main means for colonisation, had become the very mechanism that facilitated the Philippines's emancipation. In Pasión y Revolución, Roldan incorporates four layers of different fabrics to represent various dimensions of Filipino society. Floral cotton material - typically made into house dresses for women or other domestic textiles like curtains, bed covers and tablecloths - make up the first and largest layer; lace, worn by Catholic women as veils during mass (tacurong or mantillas), comprise the second; artist Giah De Los Reves's traditionally hand-dyed textiles form the third (and are embroidered with Tagalog and Latin words like 'Mabuhay ang Pilipinas [Long live the Philippines] or CORPUS CRISTI). Lastly and central to the composition, Roldan affixes found anting-anting [amulet] vests that would protect wearers from violence during the struggle against the Spanish and Americans in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Within the context of this exhibition's framework, however, Roldan prompts the viewer to think critically about the perceived success of the 1896 revolution. The Ilustrados, who emerged as the ruling class, perpetuated a western-informed elitism that sustained their power. Ileto states that in the Katipunan rebellion's aftermath, 'radical interpretations of independence from elements of the "poor and ignorant class" (to paraphrase the ilustrados) were branded as "antirevolutionary" by the leaders of the republic'. Ileto continues, 'Egalitarianism and mass mobilisation were concepts that threatened the leadership of the illustrados', and when the Americans assumed control over the Philippines, this group became complacent and allowed the continued subjugation of their countrymen to maintain their privileged class position.

Born Again Revolution turns to the Charismatic Renewal Movement that gained popularity in the Philippines during the 1980s as Marcos's military dictatorship continued to ravage the country. Like Pasión y Revolución, Roldan again includes four different fabrics and embroiders religious imagery and text around the artwork. In Born Again Revolution 03, for example, Roldan incorporates lace printed with floral motifs and embroidered prayers that proclaim, 'Mahal Kita / O Diyos / Wala ng Iba [I love you / O God / There is nothing else]'. However in lieu of the anting-anting vest, Roldan fastens an El Shaddai panyo [prayer handkerchief] to the centre of the composition which features prayers and religious images. El Shaddai was and is arguably the Philippines's most popular sect of the Catholic Charismatic Movement, formed in 1984 by Mike Velarde and named after the Hebrew words for 'God Almighty'. In the early days of this campaign, Roldan and his then-wife briefly joined the 'Couples for Christ' subgroup in which the artist witnessed first-hand the movement's teachings that prioritised a spiritual revolution over the material one raging around them, thereby diverting attention, recruitment and efforts from the democratic rebellion.

The final series, West Philippine Revolution, looks to the poetry of the second and third century Chinese commander Cao Cao who conquered the entire northern region of China. In addition to his cruelty, Cao was known for his contributions to the Shanshui poetry movement. In each work of West Philippine Revolution, Roldan takes one of Cao's remaining poems, 'Walking from Xiamen and Looking at the Blue Sea' (date unknown) and embroiders a single line unto the middle of found silk 'Chinese Blankets' the artist sourced from ukay-ukay [second-hand] stores around his home in Roxas City. Each line thereafter is a translation of Cao's poetry, from English (by David Bowles in 2014), to Tagalog and English again (by Filipino poet Khavn de la Cruz in 2019). What emerges are peculiar iterations: 观沧海 [I draw East to Mount Jieshi] in West Philippine Revolution 01, for example, becomes 'I went to the Pregnant Mountain'. Here Roldan plays with the specificity of language and its distortions, criticising the Chinese government's claim over the West Philippine Sea, regarded by them as the 'South China Sea', as well as their escalating violence towards Philippine coast guards. These silk bedspreads seem also to allude to China's 'blanket' neocolonialism, but Roldan directly intervenes in the fabric by embroidering these translations into the material as a symbolic reclaiming of territory.

Through these three series, Roldan considers the complications and shortcomings of revolutionary movements concerning the Philippines, both from the coloniser and colonised perspective. With Pasión y Revolución, Roldan underlines the elitism that inevitably led to the country's continued colonial subjugation; Born Again Revolution criticises spiritual movements that detract from reality; and West Philippine Revolution lambasts China's neocolonialism through language. Yet contradiction prevails within these works as elitism, religion and language have and will continue to contribute to the communist agenda. With How Not to Win a Revolution, however, the artist clarifies that emancipation is far from a static end and advocates for critical inquiry into the pursuit of revolution. Inevitably, history continues after liberation; what remains are the consequences that succeed it.

NORBERTO ROLDAN

Norberto Roldan (b. 1953, Roxas City, Philippines; lives and works in Roxas City) has been a leading figure in the artistic landscape of the Philippines for decades. His installations, assemblages and paintings of found objects, text fragments, and found images address issues surrounding everyday life, history, collective memory, and the ways in which material objects are re-appropriated in another context.

In 1986, he founded the seminal artist group Black Artists in Asia-a Philippines-based group focused on socially and politically progressive practice-and in 1990 he established VIVA EXCON (Visayas Islands Visual Arts Exhibition and Conference), the region's longest-running biennale. Presently, he is the Artistic Director of Green Papaya Art Projects, which he co-founded in 2000. This independent artist-run initiative and alternative art space fosters collaboration and cultural exchange between artists, and remains the longest running independent and multi-disciplinary platform in the country. He graduated with a degree in BA Philosophy from St. Pius X Seminary and took his BFA in Visual Communication from the University of Santo Tomas.

He was represented in several landmark surveys like No Country: Contemporary Art for South/Southeast Asia, Solomon R Guggenheim Museum (2013); Between Declarations & Dreams: Art of Southeast Asia Since the 19th Century, National Gallery Singapore (2015); SUNSHOWER: Contemporary Art from Southeast Asia 1980s to Now, National Art Centre Tokyo (2017); and, Passion and Procession: Art of the Philippines, Art Gallery of New South Wales (2017).
